Dating customs are very different around the world. In this article, we take a look at what is different about dating a Chinese girl. There are plenty of those all thanks to the fact that conservatism still rules the culture. To give you an idea of what awaits you if you are serious about this endeavour, we have put together a list of 5 differences in dating in China and dating in the West.

1. School Comes First

As you probably already know, education is highly valued in Asia and China is no exception here. Most students focus solely on studying to be ready for college entrance exams, and that leaves no time for dating. High school students resort to secret puppy-love crushes and distant admiration, but serious dating only happens after studies are finished.

2. Parents Play a Role

The approval of parents is the most important thing in China. They have a say in everything, when their kids date, who they date and when they are ready for marriage. What you want to do is to impress the parents. There is no other way.

3. Practicality

In the West, we are used to seeing people get married because they are in love. Everything else seems like a crazy idea. In China, it can be quite different at times. People can get into relationships for practical reasons. Sometimes a couple will marry for financial stability. It sounds absurd to us because how can someone be happy like that, right?

4. Intimacy

Because the Chinese culture is so conservative, there is no real intimacy before the marriage. So if you were looking to date a Chinese girl casually then you are hard pressed to find someone who is willing to go there before getting hitched. Intimacy for them is a sign that the relationship has taken the most serious course.

5. Pressure

The pressure to find a partner after one is finished with their studies is enormous. The parents don't hold back, and this may be another reason there are so many marriages where love does not play a role. The pressure for Chinese women is felt even more, especially for those who are over 30 years of age.
